about beer

Beer is the world's most widely consumed and probably oldest alcoholic beverage; the third most popular drink overall after water and tea. It is produced by the brewing and fermentation of starches mainly derived from cereal grains—most commonly malted barley, although wheat, corn, and rice are widely used. Most beer is flavored with hops, which add bitterness and act as a natural preservative, though other flavorings such as herbs or fruit may occasionally be included.

Beer can be divided into two basic categories:
Lager and Ale.

The most basic difference between the two is that Lagers are made using a bottom fermenting style yeast while Ales use a top fermenting style yeast.

Lagers are generally fermented at cooler temperatures (below 50 degrees F) while Ales are generally fermented at warmer temperatures (60 - 70 degrees F).
